

My little Airpod

This 3x2 little device, dressed up as Inosuke, holds two small earbuds, but it's so much more than just a set of AirPods Pros. It's a lifeline, a steady presence in my pocket, as reliable as a close friend. I rely on it, reaching for it in moments of anxiety, isolation, and cold—not the physical kind, but the kind that creeps in when the world feels a bit too loud or too distant. Without these buds, I feel exposed and unsettled. With them, I can feel warm and steady.

This isn't just any AirPods case; I went out of my way to “dress it up,” turning it into a miniature version of my favorite character, Inosuke. When I look at it, I see more than the case—I see a bit of myself in that quirky, comforting disguise. Inosuke is known for his toughness, his wildness, and even his silliness; all qualities that I find grounding. My little Inosuke AirPods are a reminder to stay strong, yet to keep a little humor close at hand, especially when life feels like it's breaking apart.

There's something reassuring about the case's smooth, slightly cool plastic. Its small weight rests perfectly in my hand, like a talisman or a lucky charm. I know that as soon as I pop the case open and slip those buds in, the rest of the world melts into the background. The sound quality wraps me up and pulls me into a space that's entirely mine. Whether I'm listening to my favorite music, a podcast, or just the soft hum of white noise, it's like stepping into a safe bubble.

I remember moments when these AirPods kept me steady—in a crowded building, where every eye seemed to track my every move, each conversation around me pulling my attention in different directions. It's as if I can hear my name echoing through the noise, that unsettling feeling like I'm on the edge of something, about to bump into someone, something, or even my own doubts.

At that moment, I reach into my pocket, find my little lifeline, pop the cap, and plug myself into safety. The world recedes—the noise dims, the people blur, and suddenly, there's just me and the calm that fills my ears. The voices that pulled and poked at me vanish, the feeling of being watched fades, and I'm left with a clearer path. I walk forward, feeling focused, feeling like I'm back in control. The AirPods aren't just blocking out the sound; they're anchoring me, setting me back on track, reminding me of where I'm going and who I am.

It may sound silly, but this little, tacky-looking device is truly something I can't leave my house without. It feels almost essential, I have grown dependent on it, and even if I don't use it having it next to me keeps me at peace. It might just look like a plastic case, dressed up like a character from a show, but to me, it's an essential part of my day-to-day life.