

The Seasons of You

You walk away just as orchids bloom—
The scent I sense but can't caress.
Soft pinks and greens burst from the ground,
but I'm wrapped by the stems,
watching you disappear, slipping into summer.

The sun drapes over me, golden and warm,
I melt into its soft embrace, lazy and sunkissed,
like a cat sprawled on a sun-drenched porch,
wishing to linger in this tender glow forever.
You're a warmth I wish to hold and never let go,
but we fall, fading into fall.

Leaves fall, each one a memory of you,
crackling underfoot like your voice I can't let go.
October's wind is sharp, slicing my skin
Pushing into the quiet hush of winter.

In the blue light of December, the world stills.
I breathe out fog and wait, tracing shapes in snow.
Maybe a voice, a warmth, will come through the cold—and with it, the tender pulse of spring once more.